

GOVERNMENT

The study of government is considered an opportunity for the student to understand the political framework in which he moves as a citizen. This includes Federal, state and local governments, with particular reference to the South, but encompassing a comparison of the different systems in vogue in this country and in other parts of the world. The courses in government should provide a basis for the student who wishes to pursue the study of government in post-graduate work; it also should give each student an intellectual background that will help him to function more intelligently as a citizen.

ECONOMICS

The fundamental factors of economics and their importance in the daily life of individuals as well as their significance in the social structure are the considerations around which the courses in economics are built. The relation of economics to other social sciences is also examined, with special reference to the importance of economics in the development of the United States.

SOCIOLOGY AND ANTHROPOLOGY

The aim of students in these two fields is to discover cause and effect in social processes. The student gains an acquaintance with sociological method in general courses; in more specialized courses, he applies the method to specific areas of historical and contemporary phenomena. Choice of material is dictated by the interests of students and instructors. Beyond the mere learning of a particular discipline, courses are intended to give an understanding of the great problems of modern society.
